

While student governments have come and gone on the University of Delaware campus, the Resident Student Association has continued to grow and serve the student body-resident students in particular. More often than not, the work has been away from the spotlight, but the successes have been many and significant.

For student government, the sixties meant a great deal of publicity but very little in concrete accomplishments. Moratoria and demonstrations were very big, but when the smoke cleared, all that remained were a slightly improved Student Government Constitution and a now-floundering Student Judicial System. The RSA, however, was waging a battle for visitation rights, and succeeded in 1969. On a campus where just three years earlier, the then President Perkins has refused parking privileges to students in residence halls saying: "No co-ed is going to get pregnant in the back seat of any car while I'm president!" the advent of visitation can be called a major accomplishment.

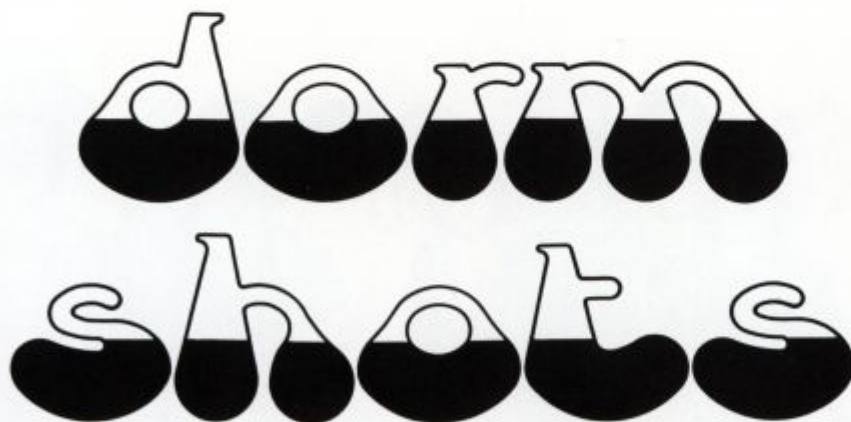

It was also the RSA that effected the policy change which permitted resident students to keep refrigerators in their dorm rooms. With the revenue from over 800 refrigerators rented each year, the RSA is able to support itself entirely, and also finance a Grants-to Residence-Halls program which in 1975-76 will be budgeted over one thousand dollars.

Another significant accomplishment was the Experimental Alcohol Policy. While a bit cumbersome at the outset, this policy is the first positive step toward a realistic situation on campus in which resident students will be given the same rights and responsibilities with regard to the consumption of alcohol in floor and hall lounges as those afforded to persons living in a private residence. This change is one more step away from the "en loco parentis" syndrome which has characterized this college campus for so long.

While students have been complaining about the problems on campus, The RSA has been doing something about them. Though progress can be painfully slow at times, and the results are not always one hundred percent of the goal, the RSA has shown that concerned students working together is an effective means for change on the University of Delaware campus.
