INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 6.

The grand equal rights league of the colored people of Indiana held their second annual session to-day, Rev. J. Brittain presiding. About 100 delegates were in attendance. The proceedings were somewhat mixed and slightly racy.

The chairman, in his address, advised colored men to keep aloof from both parties for the present, but to be ready to throw themselves into the embraces of that party which offered the best dicker.

Rev. I. M. Miller, the most talented delegate present, made a speech in reply. He disagreed with the chairman in regard to taking sides. He said there was but one legitimate party in the country—the only one that colored men could recognize. He thanked God there was not a single rebel, traitor, copperhead or scalawag that sported the complexion which prevailed in this convention.

A white man named John Street, from Rush county, a red-headed, sandy-whiskered and fair faced patriot, took a prominent part in the proceedings, occasionally throwing his arms lovingly about the neck of some kinky-headed delegate.

The convention appointed a committee to memorialize the legislature for suffrage, and decided to send delegates to the national convention at Washington.

The case of Lambden P. Milligan, indicted for treason, will come up at the present term of the United States court.

The grand division of the Sons of Temperance met to-day.
